on her sixteenth birthday a present of a handsome diamond neckiese from her god-father. It was an extravagant gift for a young girl, but the donor was rich and eccentric. Miss Grace was naturally highly delighted with her first really good piece of jewelry, and wore it with conscious pride at a little birthday party the same evening. Her parents were away on the continent, possibly or they might have objected to this proceeding. In their absence, however, Miss Grace scoffed at the wisdom of her elder sisters, who represented, not without a spice of envy, where the plate was kept, being, apparently, rather unduly elated at the "That's him clear enough, sir," sensation it had caused.

In the middle of the night the household was aroused by a loud shriek, and Miss Grace was found on the landing outside her door in a very Dr. Lake; "meanwhile, we had better," Byscared and hysterical state. While the search was proceeding, Dr. Lake was requested to step up Pianos and Organs sold stairs to Miss Grace's room, where one ror and could not be brought to. The doctor was a young practitioner who was said to be extremely clever at his profession, but he was allowed few opportunities of giving evidence of ability. In other words, he had no patients, though he had been in practice s year or two, and was under-going that painful period of probation which falls to the lot of most medical

He soon disposed of his patient, whom he restored to consciousness by the simple and summary method of dousing her head with cold water. He then turned to Miss Grace, who was now quiet and composed, and looked very pretty with her fair hair down her back, he flushed cheeks and her smart esstar g gown, which showed off her girlish figure to advantage. He knew the family rather intimately, in a neighborly way, and had, in fact, spent the evening there an hour or two previously, so he accosted her without ceremony, and proceeded to feel her pulse, keeping his eyes fixed
